“Compassionate Consumption”?: George Gascoigne’s 'The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting' and the voice of the dish

Article  (Accepted Version)

This version is available from Sussex Research Online: http://sro.sussex.ac.uk/id/eprint/73578/

This document is made available in accordance with publisher policies and may differ from the published version or from the version of record. If you wish to cite this item you are advised to consult the publisher’s version. Please see the URL above for details on accessing the published version.

Copyright and reuse:
Sussex Research Online is a digital repository of the research output of the University.

Copyright and all moral rights to the version of the paper presented here belong to the individual author(s) and/or other copyright owners. To the extent reasonable and practicable, the material made available in SRO has been checked for eligibility before being made available.

Copies of full text items generally can be reproduced, displayed or performed and given to third parties in any format or medium for personal research or study, educational, or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge, provided that the authors, title and full bibliographic details are credited, a hyperlink and/or URL is given for the original metadata page and the content is not changed in any way.
In May 2016, it was reported that the number of vegans in Britain had risen by 360% in ten years.¹ Shortly after, Counterpoint published a report entitled ‘Compassionate Consumption: How Veganism is Taking Over Western Europe,’ which suggested that increasing numbers of Western Europeans are rejecting animal products due to an ethical concern for animal rights.² The report also argued that the sudden rise in veganism has largely been spurred on by key documentaries, such as Live and Let Live and Earthlings, which attempt to give animals a voice... and expose their suffering at the hands of humans. These documentaries may find a surprising counterpart in George Gascoigne’s 16th-century hunting manual, The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting.

First published in 1575 as a loose translation of Jacques du Fouilloux’s La Vénerie, The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting has received considerable critical attention in recent years due to the inclusion of four poems that give a voice to animals commonly pursued in the hunt – that of the hart, the hare, the otter and the fox. It is difficult to ascertain the intention of these poems, let alone their impact on 16th-century conceptions of animal welfare, but the manual is unique in asking its readers to consider the feelings of these four animals. In this way, The Noble Art can be compared to 21st-century documentaries which ask their viewers to rethink their consumption of animal products. Although it is unlikely that he was a spokesperson for vegetarianism, let alone veganism, this article considers whether Gascoigne was similarly asking his readers to show some compassion towards the animals they hunted, killed and consumed.

In the early modern period, hunting was justified by the assumption that man had complete authority over nature. This anthropocentric view was derived from the Bible, which stated that God granted man ‘dominion ouer the fish of the see, and ouer the foules of the ayre, and ouer all the beasts that crepe upo[n] the earth’ (Genesis 1:28). After the flood this power was increased when God informed Noah: ‘Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you’ (Genesis 9:2). Consequently, the consumption of animals was represented as a God-given right in the period and as Erica Fudge has shown in her work on purity and meat eating, although there were vegetarians, a meat-free diet was considered ‘bizarre.’

As a favoured pastime of royalty and the English aristocracy, the hunt was also seen as an ennobling activity. However, the Forest and Game Laws, which restricted hunting to a privileged few, were a source of significant social tension because common people wanted the right to hunt for themselves, both for the purposes of leisure and food. In response to these laws, there were numerous incidents of poaching throughout the period. Admittedly these were largely acts of social rebellion, but arguably poaching was also carried out in order to

---

5. The Folger Digital Collection has several images from the 1611 edition of The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting <http://luna.folger.edu/luna/servlet/s/548f> [accessed 20 February 2017].
obtain sustenance.\footnote{8} Such acts conflicted with the high culture of the Elizabethan hunt which viewed ‘hunting for the pot’ as vulgar. Indeed, sumptuous banquets usually accompanied hunting trips, compounding the pleasure taken in the chase and the status of those that partook in the sport. The poems included in the Noble Art pointedly criticise the enjoyment taken in hunting animals and the excessive consumption that occurred during the accompanying feasts, contrasting the insatiable greed of those in attendance with the temperance exhibited by animals.

The Renaissance scholar Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa was an ardent opponent of the hunt precisely on these grounds, and asserted in The Vanity of Arts and Sciences that hunting was only justifiable if ‘[n]ecessity should be occasions of its Commendations.’ To support this viewpoint, Agrippa gave the examples of when ‘Meleager flew the Caledonian Boar not for his own pleasure, but to free his country from a common Mischief. So Romulus hunted Deer not for pleasures-sake, but to get food.’\footnote{9} Gascoigne similarly criticised the hunt for its lack of necessity through the two poems, ‘The wofull words of the Hart to the Hunter’ and ‘The Hare, to the Hunter,’ which challenged claims that these animals are killed because they are harmful or profitable to humans. The hart asks:

‘Must thou therefore procure my death? for to prolong
Thy lugging life in lustie wise? alas thou doest me wrong.
Must I with mine owne fleshe, his hatefull fleshe so feede,
Whiche me disdaynes one bitte of grasse, or corne in tyme of neede?

\footnote{9} Henry Cornelius Agrippa, The Vanity of Arts and Sciences (London: Printed by J. C. for Samuel Speed, 1676) <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A26566.0001.001/1:8.77?rgn=div2;vid=52069;view=fulltext> [accessed 20 February 2017].
Alas (Man) do not so, some other beastes go kill,
Whiche worke thy harme by sundrie meanes: and so content thy will.
Which yeelde thee no such gaynes, (in lyfe) as I renew
When from my head my stately hornes, (to thy behoofe) I mew.’

Similarly, the hare laments:

‘But I poore Beast, whose feeding is not seene,
Who breake no hedge, who pill no pleasant plant:
Who stroye no fruite, who can turne vp no green,
Who spoyle no corne, to make the Plowman want:
Am yet pursedewd with hounde, horse, might and mayne
By murdring men, untill they haue me slayne.’

---

10 Gascoigne, sig.I6 <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A14021.0001.001/1:48.2?rgn=div2;view=fulltext> [accessed 20 February 2017].

11 Gascoigne, sig.L8–M <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A14021.0001.001/1:66.1?rgn=div2;view=fulltext> [accessed 20 February 2017].

It is important to note that in ‘The wofull words of the Hart to the Hunter,’ the hart acknowledges that its flesh does provide necessary sustenance for humans but claims it is more profitable when left alive. The hare in contrast states that it is of little nutritional benefit as its flesh ‘Is neyther, good, great, riche, fatte, sweete, nor sounde.’ Despite this claim, hares were a common source of protein in the 16th century. Considering the status of harts and hares as food sources, Gascoigne’s criticism does not appear to be aimed at meat-eating but rather at the ‘lustie’ pleasure humans take in ‘murdring’ animals – a criticism which becomes more apparent in the poems of the otter and the fox, animals which were regarded as vermin and therefore inedible.

Killing animals that were viewed as destructive to human food sources was justified in the Tudor period through laws such as The Preservation of Grain Act (first passed in 1532 by Henry VIII and enhanced by Elizabeth I in 1566), which made it compulsory for individuals to kill creatures that appeared on an official list of ‘vermin’ – a term that continues to be used today to justify the hunting of animals, such as foxes and badgers. The Act was largely drawn up to counter food shortages and the spread of disease caused by population growth and a series of bad harvests. Due to their supposedly ravenous natures, the otter and the fox were listed alongside a number of other animals as vermin; as such, Mary Fissell has argued that they were viewed as poachers of human food.

In The Noble Art, the reader is informed that the otter will ‘destroy all the fishe in your pondes’ and ‘A litter of Otters, will destroy you all the fishe in a ryuer (or at least, the greatest store of them) in two myles length.’ Comparably, the fox is described in Edward Topsell’s The Historie of Foure-Footed Beastes ‘as such a devouring beast that it forsaketh nothing fit to be eaten.’ In relation to economic crisis, Fissell argues that ‘[v]ermin threatened the always tenuous balance between ease and hardship, satiety and starvation and enough and not enough.’ Gascoigne profits from this tension and uses the poems of the otter and the fox to comment on the ruling elite, who butchered animals for pleasure and denied the common

---

15 Gascoigne, sig.N4v, N4v <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A14021.0001.001/1:78?rgn=div1;submit=Go;subview=detail;type=simple;view=fulltext; q1=A+litter+of+Otters,+will+destroy+you+all+the+fishe+in+a+ryuer++or+at+least,+the+greatest+store+of+them++in+two +myle+length> [accessed 20 February 2017]

17 Fissell, p.2.
people the legal right to hunt for food. In so doing, Gascoigne places the blame on those who hold power, rather than on the animals that were made scapegoats for food shortages.

George Gascoigne, 'The Otters Oration', in The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting (London: Printed by Thomas Purfoot, 1611). Used by permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 4.0 International License.

'The Otter’s oration’ challenges the anthropocentric view found in the Bible that ‘all that is, was made for vse of man,’ by warning that ‘The very Scourge and Plague of God his Ban, / Will lyght on suche as queynty can devise / To eate more meate, than may their mouthes suffice.’ This criticism of overindulgence is furthered in the poem through an extended comparison of human gluttony with the restraint practiced by animals:

‘The beastly man, muste sitte all day and quasse,
The Beaste indeede, doth drinke but twice a day,
The beastly man, muste stuffe his monstrous masse
With secrete cause of surfetting alwaye:
Where beasts be glad to feede when they get pray,'
And neuer eate more than may do them good,
Where men be sicke, and surfet thorough foode.
Who sees a Beast, for savrie Sawces long?
Who sees a Beast, or chicke or Capon cramme?
Who sees a Beast, once luld on sleepe with song?
Who sees a Beast make vensone of a Ramme?
Who sees a Beast destroy both whelpe and damme?
Who sees a Beast vse beastly Gluttonie?
Which man doth vse, for great Ciuitie.'

The repetition of ‘beastly man’ creates a direct comparison between human and animal, collapsing the boundary that separates the two. This ‘beastly man’ does not describe humans in general but those who can afford to satisfy their appetites with luxurious and socially-specific dishes, for example venison, which was legally restricted to the ruling elite. Furthermore, the poem suggests that feasts, such as those which accompanied hunting trips, are ‘civilised’ occasions that paradoxically allow humans to satisfy their ‘beastly gluttonie.’

‘The Foxe to the Huntsmen’ extends the criticism of the ruling elite in a more direct manner. The poem’s speaker is specifically identified as ‘Raynard the foxe,’ the medieval allegorical figure who was often represented as a peasant hero in stories which satirized the ruling elite – a motif that is also found in Disney’s Robin Hood (1973) in which the eponymous character is represented by a wily fox. In Gascoigne’s poem, Raynard confesses that he is a greedy creature and agrees that ‘by his death […] al the farmers welth, may thriue & come to good’ as he will no longer prey upon their livestock. However, he goes on to assert that man is a ‘two leggd foxe’ who will ‘fleese a fee, / From euerie widowes flocke, a capon or a chicke, / A pyg, a goose, a dunghill ducke, or ought that salt will licke / Untill the widowe sterue, and can no longer giue.’ The poem also suggests that the humans who hunt foxes ‘To kepe their neighbours poultry free, & to defende their flocks’ are hypocrites because they ‘spoyle, more profit in an houre, / Than Raynard rifles in a yere, when he doth most deuore.’ The poem is clearly directed at those individuals who took advantage of the changing economic climate of the late 16th century in order to profit from both the land hunger and the rising prices of the time. By dehumanising those who prey upon the weak and vulnerable for their own benefit,

---

18 Gascoigne, sig. A4v-A2v <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A14021.0001.001/1:79.1?rgn=div2;view=fulltext> [accessed 20 February 2017]
19 Gascoigne, sig.N3r; sig.N3v; sig.N4r <http://quod.lib.umich.edu/e/eebo/A14021.0001.001/1:76.2?rgn=div2;view=fulltext> [accessed 20 February 2017].
identifying such humans as the true foxes, Gascoigne undermines the conventional justification of hunting animals that were conveniently labelled as vermin because they poach human food.

The poems of the hart, the hare, the otter and the fox included in The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting primarily express anger at the wider social and economic tensions of the period, but they also appeal for compassion for the animals that are hunted for leisure rather than for necessary sustenance, revealing ‘master Man’ as the ‘moste bloudie beaste of all.’ As with the 21st-century documentaries that advocate veganism, Gascoigne’s poems may not have convinced every reader to change their views on animal welfare but perhaps they caused some to question the pleasure taken in the hunt and the excessive consumption of animal products.

---